Excerpt: .of the Little Missouri, was met on his return by several of the soldiers, who whipped him severely, and destroyed his gun and bow and arrows, cutting his robe and meat to pieces. Scouts were kept stationed on the hills to discover, and two fine horses were ready to be given to the Red-Cherry in event of his medicine proving good and strong. The evening of the third day came, and brought no tidings of the approach of buffalo. Opinions began to be freely expressed that the medicine was worthless, and the Four-Bears, who had not yet been able to dream, was gloomy and despondent. There was no meat in camp; some families began to experience the pangs of hunger, and the tide of popular feeling was setting in very strong against the would-be Medicine man. The unsuccessful aspirant for medical distinction said, in...
